This regenerates the Permutit, yielding up its oxygen to it and making it highly active again. This is the analogous process to the regeneration by salt, in the case of Sodium-Permutit in water softening. This property which Manganese Permutit has, of assimilating oxygen and yielding it up again readily, has been turned to account on an industrial scale for the removal of iron from waters, for the removal of manganese in any form from waters, and for the sterilisation of water. Suppose we have a filter filled with Manganese-Permutit, and we filter water containing iron through it. The iron is oxidised by the high oxides of manganese which are precipitated in the Permutit. Oxide of iron is thereby precipitated in the upper layers of the filter bed, and a water chemically free from iron passes through. There are no...
