Excerpt: . . . acts of his comedy, and delighted us with his work. No cleverer dialogue had we heard for many a day, while the characters were admirably adapted, it seemed to us, to their proposed exponents. This helped much to cheer our departure for the Engadine; since the extraordinary success of School, the result of which entirely passed all the hopes I had formed of the theatres possibilities, justified our resuming the run of it, when we began work again in November. The season closed brilliantly. Never was the saying A bad beginning makes a good ending more amply verified. I have told how, on the opening night, some occupants of the second circle were discontented and riotous; let my postscript on the last night be that they cheered us again and again with cries of Come back soon! On the following evening, Mrs. Bancroft had the...
